Researchers at the University of Illinois at Chicago (UIC) have used molecular dynamics simulations to build a nanoscale propeller with molecule-sized blades. This is the first time that researchers are looking at nanodevices able to pump fluids. However, they recognize that such devices will not be available before several years. If these nano propellers ever come on the market, they would be used for applications such as precisely targeting medicines and regulating flow into and out of cells. You can see above “a water propeller made from a rotating carbon nanotube, with blades of hydrophobic aromatic molecules.” (Credit: Petr Král’s team, UIUC, via Physical Review Letters). These nano propellers have been simulated by Petr Král, Assistant Professor in Physical Chemistry...
